Dopamine use in acute renal failure (ARF) patients has been considered standard practice for many years. Despite this widely accepted practice, there has been limited evidence to support its usage. Low-dose dopamine has been accepted because it is considered to pose minimal risk to the patient. Dopamine infused at low doses is thought to be specific to dopaminergic receptors. However its results are often unpredictable and can lead to several alpha and beta induced side effects. With advances in technology there is another option that may be superior in the prevention and treatment of acute renal failure. Fenoldopam is a drug specific to dopamine-1 receptors in the kidneys. It is currently being examined to determine its usefulness among patients with ARF.

Format Paper
There are two ways to create a bibliography and in-text citations for articles and research papers.
For Microsoft® Word, use the Cite While You Write™ plug-in.
For most other word processors, use the "Format Paper" feature with an RTF document. Follow these steps:
1. Select an RTF document to format. Type in the file name or use the 'Browse' / 'Choose File' button.

2. Select a bibliography format for your document. 投稿スタイルを選びます。

3. Format paper with unmatched citations:
EndNote Web automatically checks the document for unmatched or ambiguous citations and alerts you. You can bypass this proofing step by checking the box.
4. Click 'Format' to have EndNote Web create a copy of your paper complete with formatted citations.

Formatをクリックします。

It is currently being examined to determine its usefulness among patients with ARF. With the discovery of fenoldopam and the known serious side effects of dopamine, there is reason to use caution with the routine use of low-dose dopamine.
